CAN I Learn to Fly?

By WILLIAM R. NELSON

First Instructions
LEARNING to fly starts with advice about the correct mental and physical attitude the student should assume.

"Be yourself," cautioned my instructor. "Be natural, and above all else, be relaxed. We instructors will excuse everything else you do if you will remember to be light on the controls."

I was loaned a helmet that had speaking tubes connected to it. Next a parachute was explained and put on. "The rule with the chute is; jump, count five, then pull this handle," my instructor explained.

The handle protrudes from a pocket that opens vertically, just over the heart. One quick jerk on it releases the "pilot" or small, umbrella-like chute which pulls the big chute out of the pack.

My instructor next drew a map of the airport and its surrounding landmarks, explaining he would show them to me from above. "This is 'home' and it is important that you recognize it readily from the air," he explained.

Next I was shown how to climb into the rear seat of the two-seater, dual controlled, plane. Seated, with my parachute tucked as a cushion, the seat strap clamped lightly across my lap, the instruments and controls were pointed out, named, and their uses explained.

"The control stick—a rubber handled vertical lever that stands between the knees—is moved backward to make the plane climb, pushed forward to go down, inclined to the right to turn right and to the left to turn left," he said.

The rudder, also used in turning, is operated with the feet. To turn right, push the right foot; to turn left, push the left foot.

I was cautioned to familiarize myself with the altimeter which tells the altitude, the air speed indicator, the oil pressure gauge, and the tachometer which tells the revolutions per minute the motor is turning; and to learn to read them at a glance.

My instructor climbed into the seat ahead of me, connected the speaking tube to my helmet, opened the throttle to "revs up" the motor to check its functioning, ordered the blocks taken from in front of the wheels and we were off.

A young intellectual is one who is always talking about new ideas but never has any.

It must be nice to move in the best society and get your name in the most exclusive advertisements.

VITAMIN-RICH FOODS
The popular food is the one who is able to serve the common things in an uncommon way. We need to serve daily foods rich in vitamins, and they may be found in the cheap vegetables so common everywhere.

Red Cabbage and Apples—Wash a small cabbage and cut it into quarters, remove the hard core. Cover with boiling water and cook ten minutes. Drain and chop. Pare, core and chop three medium-sized apples, mix with the cabbage. Melt two tablespoonsful of shortening and add the cabbage and apples. Cook five minutes, then add three-fourths of a cupful of stock, one-fourth cupful of vinegar, one teaspoonful each of salt and sugar, a grating of nutmeg and a few dashes of pepper. Cover and cook slowly until tender.

Macedoine of Vegetables—Melt three tablespoonsful of shortening, add one tablespoonful of chopped onion and the same of chopped potato. Cook for five minutes. Add two tablespoonsful of flour, and when well mixed add two cupfuls of canned tomatoes and cook until the mixture thickens slightly. Add one cupful of peas, corn, lima beans or carrots, one and one-half cupfuls of boiled rice, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, two tablespoonsful of salt and one-half cupful of grated cheese add a dash of cayenne and bake for twenty minutes in a hot oven.

Stuffed Eggplant—Cut one egg plant into halves and cook in boiling salted water until almost tender. Drain well, scoop out the centers. Melt one tablespoonful of butter, add one small onion minced, and cook until a light brown. Chop the centers taken from the eggplant, add one cupful each of bread crumbs and steamed tomatoes, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one teaspoonful of salt and one-eighth teaspoonful of pepper. Fill the eggplant halves and cover with buttered crumbs. Bake in a moderate oven.

Attribute Quakes to Earth-Shaking Giants

In southern Italy, where earthquakes are of frequent occurrence, old peasants have many queer legends which have been handed down for centuries. In the neighborhood of Mount Etna one of the strangest of these is widely believed. The peasants will tell you that centuries ago their ancestors won the land from a race of giants. They compelled the giants to take refuge underground. There they remain and cannot escape, but from time to time they cause earthquakes, showing that they have not forgotten and that they still take their revenge upon mortals. No one knows what really causes earthquakes, though it is believed that some distance below the earth's hard crust there is a plastic layer in which tides, just like those of the sea, are set up by the attraction of the sun and moon. The crust is strained by these tides, and one day a part of it, deep down, gives way. Then the surface trembles and widespread havoc occurs as buildings rock and fall.

Riley "Checked Up"

Hamlin Garland has a new James Whitcomb Riley story in his reminiscences, "Roadside Meetings." Years ago Garland was visiting the Hoosier poet at his home and had praised his fidelity to farm life. Riley smiled. "Sometimes a country boy gives me a round turn by criticizing me on my farm poems," he chuckled. "For instance, one youngster came stepping up to me. 'You never lived on a farm,' he says. 'Why not?' said I. 'Well,' he says, 'turkey cock gobbles, but he don't kyounk as your poetry says he does.' He had me right there! It's the turkey hen that kyounks. 'Well, you'll never hear another turkey cock of mine kyounkin,' I said to the boy."—Kansas City Star.

Odd Religious Sect

The word "Abecedarian" is derived from the first four letters of the alphabet and is applied to one learning the alphabet; hence an Abecedarian is a tyro or beginner, says an article in Pathfinder Magazine. As an adjective the word means rudimentary. The Abecedarians were a sect of extreme Anabaptists in Germany during the sixteenth century. They were so nicknamed because they maintained that the holy spirit would grant the elect all the knowledge necessary to truth; they despised all learning, including theology, and regarded knowledge even of the alphabet as sinful.

Time Sense in Animals

Some people have the time sense, but the vast majority of the human race is sadly deficient in this faculty. But many of the lower animals possess an extraordinarily keen time sense. Note the way in which the animals at the zoological garden become restless at the approach of the feeding hour. On the farm the horses and poultry know exactly the times they are due to be fed. Ducks are particularly clever in this way, and they will raise a small riot if their evening meal does not arrive to the minute.

Saves Wear on Stockings

Every time Charlie Payne, Jr., played marbles in Brooklyn his mother wondered how much longer she could go on buying stockings for the lad. Surely, she argued, there must be an inexpensive way of playing marbles without the fear of torn stockings, and so she began to work out an idea. With the aid of her husband, there presently appeared an object which was subsequently patented. It was a "device for projecting marbles and the like" and could be operated by a boy who stood up while he played.

BETHEL TO BERKELEY BY AUTOMOBILE

Coast to Coast Trip of Parlin Family This Fall

We finally arrived in Chicago, and found its boulevards lively with Saturday traffic. Personally I enjoy city traffic. Perhaps when I retire or "resign" I can drive a taxi. But Madeline is sure every car driving this side or that is due to grind us to powder. And when there are four or five lanes of traffic full of cars, and we are in the midst, she sees red, and blows up. However, I got her through Chicago, where we saw the new buildings, the million dollar fountain, the new waterfront. We went out to Evanston, saw the changes there and on further up the "gold coast," until we had to switch a bit west to Libertyville, Illinois. Here we spent Sunday and Labor Day with the family where she lived when a student at Northwestern. From Bethel to Chicago, according to our route was just over 2000 miles.

After these two days of rest and recreation for the kiddies we were ready to set out for the "wild west." Tuesday morning we faced showers and mist but by noon we were beginning to see the silver lining. I had made out our schedule, estimating 100 miles a day, in order to allow for dirt and gravel roads, for delay, for mud and bad weather. We had chosen as our route, the Atlantic and Pacific Yellowstone Highway, instead of the Lincoln Highway from Chicago on. It figured nearer in mileage, and the road conditions, according to the map, seemed about the same. Illinois with its good roads passed very quickly, and before we realized it we were across the Mississippi, through Dubuque and tasting a sample of Iowa dust. We decided to keep on until nightfall. So we made over 200 miles, camped at Dyersville, and found ourselves ahead of our schedule. The kiddies stood it well, the gravel roads had not felt so bad, and the dust was not bad as long as you did not let some other car pass you and make you take it. We were agreeably surprised to find the Iowa roads good and wide, with good gravel surface on a good foundation. At least that is how they seemed in the fine weather which was our lot. After we got used to them, we did not hesitate to go as fast on them as we desire to travel or ever average on the cement. This rather knocked out the basis on which I had built our schedule. And we decided to try to gain a bit each day and have more time at Yellowstone or elsewhere.

Wednesday (Sept. 3d) was a long day of over 250 miles on the gravel. Sun was warm, but always a breeze when going forty miles an hour. So at the night at Storm Lake, Iowa.

Thursday was a record day to date for mileage over 280 miles, and mostly over land flat as a stove. The roads ran for miles straight as an arrow, then turned a right angle, almost no curves, all was right angle work. north, south, east or west. We had put Iowa behind us, and were well into Nebraska. Towards nightfall the storm clouds gathered off in the west. The sunset was beautiful, until it was gradually concealed by three aggregations of storm clouds. We were still fifty miles from our chosen destination. More and more the electrical discharges made their display in the distance. Our path turned its right angle course, momentarily to north or south, then westward for a space nearer these clouds. The nearer one hung a bit to the north, the other two to west and south. We headed first towards one then towards another. Madeleine got more and more nervous. Unfortunately there were no large towns with tourist camps between us and our destination, so it seemed wiser to keep on. Before long we could occasionally hear the growl of the thunder. While all the time, flashes of lightning lit the sky. Then for some few miles the road headed straight for the heart of this formidable mass of thunder eggs. Madeleine and the smaller kids became scared to death at the repeated peals of thunder. "To go back would probably mean being overtaken by the storm since it was aiming across the path we had come. The road in front we knew not its direction. I could only comfort with the hope that it would swing elsewhere. And it did. It turned and headed for the storm swinging towards us from the southwest. Well, to make what seemed a long long story short,—that road dodged in and out among these three storms in an almost miraculous way. How a road turning as many directions could approach as closely those three storms, and the narrow way between, and finally when the two to the west and south seemed merged together, could find a gap, through which we passed, was a remarkable combination of circumstances. The last few miles into this gap, with rain on both sides and terrifying discharges on both sides will not soon be forgotten by Madeleine or the kiddies. But we reached our camp, got quickly housed before any rain reached us, and even then were spared a heavy storm. It was a gauntlet, such as I had never run before.

Nebraska demanded of us another full day (248 miles) and part of the next. Friday, the fifth of September, was a good day, but we had promised the tired kiddies that we would make it shorter than the day before and give them a chance to play or go rowing or something, before dark. But we all had a good rest. We waited around in the morning long enough to let the kiddies get their boat ride. We should have liked to look around the State Park with its weird rock formations, but were anxious to get on.

By noon on Saturday we were over the line into Wyoming. We would have known the difference by the roads. Little gravel, much dirt, and full of bumps and hollows. We had a heavy load on our bumperettes in the rear, despite the fact that we had shipped about 100 pounds on ahead by parcel post. We had to slow up some, or risk trouble, yet we made fair distance for the day. I had given Casper, Wyoming, as my first address beyond Chicago, and hoped to get a letter from mother there. Because of a side trip of eight miles which we took to see a natural bridge, we reached Casper ten minutes late, and they refused to dispense mail from General Delivery. All I could do was to ask to have it forwarded. It was quite an experience, our first visit to oil fields, but we saw enough of them before we reached San Francisco.

Sunday, we took it easy. On our way to Thermopolis Hot Springs, Wyo., something over 140 miles from Casper, we passed a wonderfully carved rocky ravine, called Hell's Half Acre. Soon after we started the climb up through the Wind River Canyon, a beautiful ride along good hard surface road, cut in the canyon walls, and passing in places through tunnels. Madeleine gets too nervous to enjoy the scenery. But I enjoy as much as I can, in the glimpses I can snatch away from the winding way. When I call her attention to the beauties, her response is to remind me to keep my eyes on the road. We had a restful afternoon at Thermopolis, visiting the wonderful terraces of the Hot Springs, seeing the buffalo herd, and some other Rocky Mountain animals. The hotels there pipe the hot water from the springs and not only use it for medicinal baths, but for heating both hotels and garages. This was the only time we staid in a hotel on the way across, and the place we were in was an apartment hotel, catering to tourists, but with the cabins all in one large building.

Monday morning we were rested and ready to set out for Yellowstone. Unfortunately the weather did not look promising. About four or five in the morning it had started raining cats and dogs, and was still going strong during breakfast hour. We had faith however in the old adage, "Rain before seven, clear before eleven." By the time we were ready to load our baggage on, it had begun to clear. We went northward a few miles along the Yellowstone Highway until our attention was attracted to sign advertising a short cut in Cody, Wyoming. On the map, the road, though marked dirt, looked like the hypothesis of a right triangle, and offered to save twenty or thirty miles. We sought information at the garage on the corner, to learn that the road was in good condition the night before, and was usually about as good in rainy weather as a long section of the main highway through the bad lands east of Cody. Although in width only an ordinary country road, its surface as far as we could see looked hard and smooth, so we decided to venture. There were eighty miles with only two towns, but we did not stop then to think what might be our condition in case of breakdown.

All went merrily for the first fifteen miles, almost as good as a hard surfaced road. There we met a man coming in the opposite direction, who informed us that as far as he had been coming (from the first town, another fifteen miles along), the road was passable, though we might have to use chains in spots. He said they had a big rain that morning further up in the hills, but that the road usually dried up very quickly. We noticed that he had chains on, as did several other cars, which passed us further on. Before we left Bethel we had planned to take chains, of which we had two pairs, one pair brand new. But we came away without them. In Iowa somewhere, fearing mud across the plains, I had bought two short mud chains, as an emergency measure. These two short links were to prove our salvation. We soon came upon signs of rain, damp places in the road surface. As first these gave us no trouble, but soon they became more extensive, and we noticed how the tracks of the automobiles which had passed that way, curved and wandered about the road. All of a sudden, we understood the reason. For Elizabeth began to slide all over the road quite unmanageable. It was our first taste of gambo. These skating rinks were not continuous, but appeared every half-mile or so. It took us an hour to do 15 miles. At Grass Creek, the first town, we asked information. They said the next 25 miles had had the heaviest rain, but that the road dried quickly and cars had already come through. So we went on, hoping for the best.

We got the worst, we ever met or hope to see. We were thankful we had not come along any earlier, for it was quite evident that the road was drying fast. Sometimes it was hard to tell whether the surface was dry enough not to skid. Over one long stretch of dry road, I took the chains off, only suddenly to run onto a hill of slime. Elizabeth twisted around and went in to all sorts of contortions. I was helpless, and fully expected to get mired in the gumbo ditch along the road. We finally came to stop with a few inches to spare. I got out in the mud and put our life-saving mud chains on. These saved the day. Soon we came to real mud holes, and deep ruts. As long as you could hold to the ruts you were fairly safe, but once outside of them, and you were slipping towards the ditch on one side or the other. It took us two hours to do those 25 miles. One hill was so cut up and soft, that Elizabeth would not climb up until the whole family volunteered to get out and walk. And we needed all the water we had along to keep her reasonably cool. The last five miles was climbing. What a welcome sight, when we topped the last rise, and looked down into a valley with something green in it. From this frontier town, forty miles from anywhere, we journeyed over an increasingly good road to Cody, the home of Buffalo Bill. We had had another experience, and all were glad it was over. My shoulders and arms that night ached with the tension and strain. To be Continued.

The Handsome Man

by MARGARET TURNBULL

Illustrations by IRWIN MYERS

Robert took a step nearer him. She looked down on the white handkerchief. "You ought not to talk so much."

"Robert, were you going to marry this fellow?"

Robert looked at him with a wide stare. Had she really been going to do that? It seemed impossible. It seemed years ago that she had thought she hated this man and loved Jack. She looked across the bed at Jack. How stupid she had been. How silly! Why the man was common! Some day she could not meet Sir George's eyes.

"I suppose I did mean to at one time," she admitted. "I was so determined to do something desperate—to get away from everything and everybody, but I won't do it now."

"Good girl!" And then Sir George added: "You couldn't anyhow. That's why I came to stop you. He's married already."

"You lie!"

"Oh, no I don't!" He said it confidently for Jack's face had been in instant confirmation. "I saw her at the dock and I heard it at headquarters. Unless you've murdered her quite recently, she's still your wife."

Robert was staring at Jack in horror. She had let a thing like this stick here!

"Robert's quite through with you," Sir George told him shortly. "And I will be in a few minutes, after you have told me how you got hold of the fact that I was taking the payroll money up the river."

Robert whirled. "Was he—was he in that, too?"

He nodded. He concealed his surprise that she should ask this. How he had misjudged Robert! "Come," he said to Jack. "I haven't any time to waste. Who told you?"

"She did."

"Oh, no! No!" Robert's voice rang out violently. "You won't believe him, do you?"

"Not if you say didn't," Sir George told her promptly. "Though I own I did look like that to me at first."

"I never told him!"

Jack laughed. "You came to say—I did?"

Jack nodded. "Everything I know I got it from you, consciously or unconsciously. You told me several things that put me on the track and it needed only a little questioning about race and cars and banks to get all I wanted out of you."

Robert's face flashed across her eyes, and he leaned against the wall. She could not face Sir George. She had been a traitor in her own father's house. She had been tricked by Jack into betraying the things he said about Sir George.

He was saying quite distinctly, "Show it to him, Robert," he whispered, "and tell him I can play at that game and you were just spoiling this man. You never meant to do it. That is why I followed you."

She stared at him. "Did father send you? Does he know?"

"No," Sir George whispered. "No one sent me. Do you think I'd let you down? Look at the paper."

"But why should you?" Robert began and then suddenly conscious of the others, hurriedly unfolded the paper. She looked at it, gasped and turned to him. She opened her mouth to speak, but Sir George put his hand over it. "Give it to the Judge," he ordered.

Meekly, and so unlike the Robert he had known that his heart contracted with pain and tenderness, she took it across to Arlett who, back against the door, surveyed it.

"I'm!" He looked at Jack. "This here's a perfectly good New Jersey marriage license made out for Robert MacBeth and Sir George Sanderson. Who's Sir George Sanderson?"

"What?" Jack came nearer and looked at the paper.

"Sir George!" Robert cried.

He held her hand. "It's quite all right. You see, Jack, there's no question now of a defenseless girl returning home, after a theatrical attempt at elopement, to be covered with shame and confusion while her father's pocketbook is emptied by a man who couldn't possibly marry her. Robert's been playing you—so that her father might lay hands on you and your gang."

He held Robert's hand tightly, so that she could not move. The puzzled and watchful Judge came forward as the two constables held the door.

"You're bluffing. This girl never intends to marry you."

Sir George laughed. It was a feeble laugh but it irritated Jack.

"It's a bluff and you can't bluff me. I've got her letters and my story and I'll—"

He came up against Arlett and the two constables at the door.

"You keep yourself to yourself," Arlett said. "No pushing and shoving until this thing's straight. What do you want done with him, mister? I won't argue with him no longer."

Sir George clung to Robert's hand, but he refused from looking at her. Try as Robert would she could not free her hand.

"Robert, my dear, Judge Arlett can marry us just as tightly and just as well as any person, and Jack and the constables will be our witnesses. Will you, Robert?"

He asked it recklessly. Robert would, of course, refuse and demand to be taken home to her father, but at least it would silence Jack, and make any attempt at blackmail impossible.

Robert hesitated and as she did Jack laughed aloud. "You see!" he said to Arlett. "It's sheer bluff! The girl came with me to marry me and no one else. He can't save her face that way."

Sir George stared straight ahead at him, smiling, waiting.

"Judge Arlett," said Robert, in a very low voice, "will you marry us now—and do anything you like with that?" She indicated Jack.

"Sure. We can jail him easy, after-ward."

Sir George could not take his eyes from the girl, who did not look at him. "Robert," he murmured, "she did not answer. She had thrown her head back and, leaning against the wall, she faced Jack."

Sir George found it hard to keep from staring at her. He did not want for a moment that to face Robert now was a life and death matter to him, but Robert was too young to understand or be pitiful.

He was so much interested in Jack's plight, he forgot his own.

Jack, who had once loomed important in Robert's life, was less than nothing now, and knew it. He made a swift leap toward the door, while the constables gaped at Robert, but Arlett was in his way, ponderous, unmoved and immovable.

"You keep away from that door, young man," he said without emotion or excitement. "You're wanted as a witness." He motioned to the younger constable. "Stand between the door and this wildcat. As justice of the peace, young man, I can lock you up and will do so if there's any more disorderly resistance. Ready, both of you?"

"Oh!" Robert whispered.

Sir George put out his hand. "Not unless you want to, Robert. It's no father. I'll understand."

Jack laughed nervously. "I told you it was a bluff. He turned to the Judge and said vehemently, 'The girl doesn't want to marry him. This foreign matter is after her money.'"

Robert gave a little gasp. She said to her knees beside the bed, but her arms about his neck and her lips close to his ear.

"George, do you really love me? Aunt Abby said you did."

At the moment, Sir George, dumfounded at Abby's audacity, could not speak. Then it came to the man suddenly that there was just a bewildered, frightened little red-headed girl. Each a surge of tenderness went through him at the touch of her lips on his ear that his whole body trembled. His eyes met hers steadily. Robert's eyelids dropped.

"Don't be a silly little fox," he said and put a languid hand on hers. "If this is Abby's plan how can we do it without?"

As he looked at her, he knew instantly that it was no thought of her own dilemma that was causing the girl to turn to him. He doubted if

by A. J. Dunlap

The biggest day back on the farm was when the threshing crew swung boldly into view. The sturdy horse power led the way. With grease-smeared cog and gear, the separator rocked along with wagons in the rear.

With shout and sledgy they stalked or down. The boss called, "Let 'er rip!" The driver cracked the drowsy team. And crack! the long lashed whip. The tumbling roll began to roll. The separator whirled to roll. And from its worn spout poured the grain. And piled the straw behind.

At dinner time we laughed and joked. In wholesome, friendly style. When Pansy passed the pie to Pete. With shy and winning smile. But when the jolly crew was gone. To thresh the next more grain, Somehow we felt a loneliness. We couldn't quite explain.

even a fleeting thought that it would silence every slanderous tongue if she was to return to the island as Lady Sanderson had crossed her mind. He was hurt and wounded in her defense and Aunt Abby had said he was dying of love for her, so she was doing wholeheartedly what she could to heal his wounds and his heart.

"All set?" asked Arlett. He indicated Jack to the younger constable. "Hurt the Bad Egg, if he explodes."

"You'll make him sign the certificate, Judge?" Sir George asked. "A photograph of that signature will do away with any blackmailing scheme he has in his dirty mind, and will make him a laughing stock in his own refined circle. If that doesn't remove him from our path I'll take a gun. I'm growing quite American, you see."

"No guns," said Judge Arlett disapprovingly. "I don't hold with them. But I'll offer this dark-complected young fellow the chance to sign and get away while the going's good."

"Jack," Sir George said amiably, "will sign to oblige the lady or I'll be compelled to tell the judge my suspicions as to his complicity with the gang who tried to get MacBeth's payroll."

He paused significantly, and held Robert's hand tightly to prevent her from speaking, for he saw that to Robert the knowledge that this man had used her to harm her father was the most overwhelming blow.

Jack looked at them, then at the other three men. "I'll sign," he muttered.

"Ready?" asked Arlett.

10:45 Morning Worship. Subject of sermon by the pastor, "The Christian's Opportunity and Privilege."

This is the day when the Congregational Churches of the United States will canvass the communities for the annual contributions for the church.

The committee which is your servant, accepts the responsibility of this work, knowing full well that you wish to maintain the high standards we have set for ourselves; but in order to do this we must all pull together. There have been several extra expenses this past year. Will you try to do a little better than last year, and then expect and merit the blessing that comes to those who make a real sacrifice for the work of the kingdom?

6:30 comrades of the Way.
Please hold Dec. 11th open for the Annual Fair. This will be well worth attending, as the ladies have made many useful and fancy articles that will meet many of your Christmas needs.

The Christmas Cantata, "King All-Glorious," will be given in the Congregational Church, Dec. 14. Solos, duets, trios, quartets and choruses will be included.

Oxford County United Parish

Embracing Albany, Center Lovell, No. Lovell, Stonham and Waterford.
Pastoral Staff: Revs. W. I. Bull, R. A. Brandon, A. C. Townsend.

The work at Center Lovell, tentatively added to the United Parish during the coming winter, is developing encouragingly. Services are held there each Sunday afternoon at two o'clock. Steps are being taken to organize a Sunday School and to arrange for moving pictures with Circle suppers.

The moving picture shown in the Parish this week is the film of Zane Grey's book, "The Light of Western Stars." It will be shown at the usual places on the usual evenings, with Circle suppers: Wednesday evening at South Waterford in the newly decorated Grange hall; Thursday evening at East Stonham; Friday evening at No. Lovell.

Last Sunday the preaching schedule was: Mr. Bull at No. Waterford and No. Lovell; Mr. Brandon at Waterford, Flat and Albany; Mr. Townsend at E. Stonham and Center Lovell. In the evening Mr. Brandon spoke to the young people of the Norway Congregational Church. On Tuesday evening of last week Mr. Townsend gave a Thanksgiving address at Harrison.

Mr. Bull and family spent Thanksgiving with his parents at Billerica, Mass., and Mr. and Mrs. Brandon were with her parents in Bangor. Mr. and Mrs. Townsend dined at home with her cousin, Miss Sawyer, of Poland as a guest.

The Waterford school gave a supper and entertainment in the Wilkins House on Saturday evening of last week. It was also the anniversary of Miss Wilkins' birthday, and of the dedication of the building, which fact was noted in brief remarks.

Estimates have been obtained for heating and plumbing the Waterford parsonage, but for lack of funds the work will not be done at present.

A very interesting pre-Thanksgiving forum was held at South Waterford on Sunday evening, Nov. 23, where various aspects of the theme, "Secret Land of Liberty," were discussed by laymen. Several young people of North Waterford and East Stonham gathered at the home of Rev. and Mrs. Brandon last Friday evening, and after a pleasant evening, a committee was appointed to arrange for other such gatherings.

Rumford—Trustees of School district voted to issue $125,000 in bonds to construct proposed addition to Stephens High School building.
